Minimizing the Cost of Judicial Review

Committee on Judicial Review

Proposed Recommendation for Committee | April 11, 2018

The typical, default judicial remedy for a legally infirm rule is to vacate the entire rule.\(^1\) There are many instances in which this remedy is appropriate, particularly when the various parts of a rule are so interrelated that none can function independently. In other instances, an agency may draft a rule so that some provisions are severable and could survive independently if a court invalidates another part of the rule. This recommendation proposes techniques agencies can undertake to draft severable rules. It also recommends reforms to ensure that interested parties and parties to litigation adequately address the question of severability on judicial review.

Total vacatur of a rule can create costs for agencies, regulated entities, regulatory beneficiaries, and the public. Regulated entities may want valid provisions of a rule to go into effect even if other portions are stuck down, because they have invested significant time, money, and resources in preparing to comply with the rule. Striking down the entire rule, as opposed to only its invalid provisions, may adversely affect the reliance interests of those entities and create instability in regulated markets and the regulatory regime. Likewise, regulatory beneficiaries may be adversely affected by the loss of beneficial valid provisions of a rule. The agency that promulgated the rule and the public also may incur substantial costs because the agency must go back to the drawing board and redo much of its previous work, potentially resulting in wasted taxpayer dollars.\(^2\) These risks are particularly great when the legal, scientific, and economic bases for agency rules have not been previously tested in court.

Moreover, the question of the proper remedy when only a portion of a rule is invalid raises fundamental issues of the proper relationship between agencies and reviewing courts.

Under the Chenery doctrine, a court should not promulgate a rule different from the rule that the agency intended to adopt, as the rulemaking function is given to the agency and not the courts by Congress.

An agency that would prefer for a court to strike down only those parts of a rule found to be invalid can use various techniques before and after promulgating rules to assist courts as they consider whether it would be appropriate to allow the valid provisions of a rule to remain in place. An agency can solicit input from stakeholders on whether a rule’s provisions would appropriately function independently and incorporate that feedback, as appropriate, into its rule. The agency can also conduct litigation risk assessments early in the rule drafting process, in which policy experts and litigators work together early on to balance the perceived costs and benefits of various regulatory options, including the potential risk of a judicial ruling invalidating aspects of the regulatory program.

It may also be helpful for the agency to include a severability clause in the regulatory text of a rule or, when appropriate, in the preamble, when it determines that the rule would be logically divisible. Courts have generally made severability decisions de novo without regard to

5. Whether an agency’s rule is severable depends on the agency’s intent. Davis Cnty. Solid Waste Mgmt. v. EPA, 108 F.3d 1454, 1459 (D.C. Cir. 1997). The courts consider whether the parts of the rule are intertwined or whether they operate independently. In making this determination, the courts examine the purpose of the agency’s rule and whether the remaining portion of the rule reasonably serves the goals for which it was designed without the severed portion. MD/DC/DE Broadcasters Ass’n v. FCC, 253 F.3d 732, 734 (D.C. Cir. 2001); see also Assoc. of Private Colleges & Universities v. Duncan, 870 F.Supp.2d 133, 155–57 (D.D.C. 2012). In Catholic Soc. Serv. v. Shalala, the D.C. Circuit the existence of severability clauses because they may view them as throwaway language. However, commentators have argued that courts should generally defer to agency views of which portions of their rules are and are not severable rather than making this decision on their own. Courts may be more inclined to defer to severability clauses if it appears that the agency has given careful consideration to how the various parts of the rule relate to one another and whether the agency intends that some of them stand on their own. Of course, this does not mean that courts should uphold the remaining portions of an agency rule if the court determines that the rule without the severed portions is not supported by the record, is not a logical extension of the rule as proposed, or suffers from some other legal defect. But similarly, courts should not reflexively invalidate all parts of an agency’s rule simply because they have determined that portions of the same rule are invalid.

Once an agency promulgates its rules, it has other ways to aid courts as they consider whether valid provisions of a rule may remain in place. Courts may often benefit from briefing articulated a statutory basis in the APA for courts to sever rules. 12 F.3d 1123, 1128 (D.C. Cir. 1994) (reasoning that section 706(2)(A) of the APA provides that a reviewing court may set aside an “agency action,” and that the definition of agency action in section 551(13) “includes the whole or a part of” an agency rule) (emphasis added); see also Wilmina Shipping v. U.S. Dept of Homeland Security, 75 F. Supp. 3d 163, 171 (D.C. Cir. 2014) (applying holding of Catholic to agency orders).

10 Another potential approach is for the agency to include fallback provisions in its rules. When the legality of an agency’s preferred regulatory course is not well established, the agency may know what its preferred second-best alternative would be were a reviewing court to determine that the agency’s preferred course is unlawful. The agency could approach this scenario by taking both courses of action through the notice-and-comment process, then promulgating a rule that imposes its preferred course of action and specifies that the second-best alternative will take effect if a reviewing court holds its preferred action to be unlawful. Fallback provisions raise a number of novel legal issues, such as how to distinguish between fallback provisions and severability clauses; whether a petitioner may lack standing when challenging a rule with a valid fallback provision; how to perform a cost-benefit analysis of the fallback provision; what is the effective date of the fallback provision; whether the provision would require an alternative CFR section; and what constitutes the administrative record when reviewing fallback provisions. These issues require further research and therefore the use of fallback provisions is beyond the scope of this Recommendation.
regarding appropriate remedies from both agencies and opposing parties.\textsuperscript{11} Input on whether the provisions of a rule should be severed; whether an infirmity was harmless error; or whether the rule should be remanded without vacatur may be particularly helpful to courts.\textsuperscript{12}

Agencies and other parties involved in litigation could benefit from a briefing policy that encourages them to submit briefing on remedies. Some agencies have reported that they are concerned that they will signal weakness to courts by raising the issue of remedies in their merits briefs.\textsuperscript{13} Other parties may also be wary of raising remedies in briefing, especially early in the litigation. A briefing policy that would allow parties to submit supplemental briefing on remedies in cases in which courts believe they will likely hold a rule unlawful, or, alternatively, that would require parties to submit all plausible arguments, including those related to remedies, in their opening briefs on the merits, could alleviate these concerns and encourage parties to provide input on remedies to courts.

This Recommendation offers best practices and factors for agencies to consider before and after promulgating rules as they seek to avoid the unintended consequences of a court striking down an entire rule when portions of the rule are valid. Not every rule will lend itself to these techniques, but adopting them in appropriate cases may produce significant benefits for agencies, regulated entities, regulatory beneficiaries, and the public.

\textsuperscript{11} The courts may desire to solicit the parties’ views on remedies, as appropriate, to ensure that they decide the issue on the same grounds as intended by the agency. See Chenery Corp., 318 U.S. at 92-94.

\textsuperscript{12} It may be premature for parties to argue that a court should remand a rule without vacating it until the parties know what error the court has found in the rule—particularly when the rule is very complex. One of the factors that bears on a court’s decision on whether to remand a rule without vacating it is whether the error that the court has found is fixable. Recommendation 2013-6, supra note 1, at 26,272. An agency cannot brief that issue unless it knows which error, out of many possible ones, the court finds to be a problem for the rule. Only once the court identifies the error, can the parties argue whether the rule can be fixed.

1. In deciding whether to implement any of these recommendations, an agency should consider programmatic, institutional, legal, and financial constraints on its ability to do so. Agencies should not use these mechanisms in a pro forma fashion, but rather consider their preferred outcome and structure their rules accordingly, as a court may only heed an agency’s efforts to ensure separable rules if they reflect the agency’s intent about how to divide the rules into conceptually distinct components.

2. Early in the process of developing a rule, the agency should consider whether the rule is appropriately focused to achieve the agency’s goals and is logically divisible into segments that function independently. If the agency determines that portions of the rule are separable and that it intends for some parts to function even if other parts are struck down as legally invalid, it should draft the rule such that it is divisible into independent segments. It should also include a severability clause in the regulatory text of the proposed rule, or, when appropriate, in the preamble. The clause should identify which segments should survive if other portions are struck down and explain how they relate to other segments in the event a court holds the rule invalid.

3. If the agency believes a rule can and should be divided into independent segments, it should solicit public input concerning the divisibility of the rule into independent segments, the benefits and costs associated with those individual segments, the appropriate scope of a severability clause, and whether the rule appropriately focuses on the agency’s goals and on a manageable set of issues. This may entail seeking input from stakeholders prior to issuing a proposed rule and soliciting input from the general public in the notice of proposed rulemaking itself. Agencies also should consult with the Office of Information and Regulatory Affairs concerning the economic effects of a proposed rule’s individual segments.

4. In view of the multiple considerations involved in severability decisions, parties involved in litigation should consider whether to address the issues of appropriate remedies in briefing if a court may find that only certain provisions of an agency’s rule are valid.
These issues include whether the provisions of a rule should be severed; whether an infirmity was harmless error; or whether the court should remand the rule without vacating it.

5. The courts may wish to solicit the parties’ views on remedies, as appropriate, to ensure that they decide the issues of remedies on the same grounds as intended by the agency.

6. Pursuant to its general rulemaking authority in 28 U.S.C. § 331, the Judicial Conference may wish to study a rules amendment to adopt a briefing policy that would encourage or require agencies and parties involved in a challenge to a rule to address remedies in briefing.
